Chapter 1: The Friday Night Drive

The headlights cut through two hours of fog between the city apartment and the quiet suburban house.

For three years, this was the geometry of their life: five days of separate meetings, deadlines, and microwave dinners, followed by forty-eight hours of polite domesticity.

When he turned the key in the front door, the house smelled of lavender tea and rain. She looked up from the dining table, her laptop screen bathing her face in pale light. 'You made good time,' she said softly.

Not 'I missed you.' Just a comment on traffic. But in the quiet cadence of thirty-five, silence was rarely hostility—it was simply the exhaustion of keeping two independent lives running.

Chapter 2: The Silent Kitchen

Saturday mornings had their own unspoken choreography.

He ground the coffee beans; she set out two mugs with chipped rims from their first apartment in Seattle. Neither spoke until the first cup was poured.

'Are we happy?' she asked suddenly, her eyes resting on the window where sparrows hopped along the wet fence.

The question was not an attack. It was an inquiry, quiet and direct, the kind of question adults ask when they realize comfort has slowly replaced wonder.
