Chapter 1: The Friday Night Drive

The 2-hour commute, the sound of keys turning, polite summaries instead of intimacy.

The rain tapped against the glass with the steady rhythm of passing years. In this room, words had weight. When they looked across the space between them, neither flinched. The story had begun long before this night, but tonight was where the silence ended.

Chapter 2: The Silent Kitchen

Saturday morning rituals, chipped mugs, the quiet question: 'Are we happy?'

The rain tapped against the glass with the steady rhythm of passing years. In this room, words had weight. When they looked across the space between them, neither flinched. The story had begun long before this night, but tonight was where the silence ended.

Chapter 3: The Box of Old Metro Tickets

Unpacking a forgotten drawer, finding memories before the schedules took over.

The rain tapped against the glass with the steady rhythm of passing years. In this room, words had weight. When they looked across the space between them, neither flinched. The story had begun long before this night, but tonight was where the silence ended.

Chapter 4: The First Real Fight

Not screaming, but the breaking of polite restraint; admitting the loneliness of success.

The rain tapped against the glass with the steady rhythm of passing years. In this room, words had weight. When they looked across the space between them, neither flinched. The story had begun long before this night, but tonight was where the silence ended.
